Continuation of 11, does NOT place the application in condition for allowance because: The Applicant argues that KISHI does not teach an electrical conductor directly connecting the first and second electrode leads as second electrode exhibiting the first and second second electrodicially short-circuiting decirculary. In the previous Final rejection, the Examiner specifically cited where in KISHI it is explicitly taught to have a electrically short-circuiting between a first electrode and second electrode (Col. 27, lines 10-17). The Applicants argue that "electrode 156-6 and electrode 156-b connected to make a short-circuit are on the same substrate, i.e., on the same electrode," and they are not the first and/or second electrode. This argument is not persausive. The Examiner's position in the Final rejection, as now, is that the terms "first electrode" and "second electrode" are broad enough that they encompass the electrode 156-and 156-b of Allel as no functionality of the electrode 156-b in the claim, and therefore that the rejection of the claim is proper. Applicant's arguments for patentability of the other claims are based on the premise that claim 1s a patentable, which is not pressusive.
